Effects of atmospheric pollutants on blood pressure in central and eastern region of Spain. Air pollution is known to have adverse effects on human health, especially respiratory and cardiovascular health. The main goal of this study was to measure the relationship between the prevalence of raised blood pressure and atmospheric pollutants in an area of central and eastern Spain (Vigo). A cross-sectional study with a cluster sampling design was undertaken, in which 1000 house-holds belonging to Vigo city were studied. The measures of exposure to air pollutants (sulfur dioxide, ozone and particulate matter 2.5-10 microm in diameter) for the days when blood pressure was measured, were interpolated using Lagozin's algorithm to estimate the average exposure throughout the year. Blood pressure was measured using an automated sphygmomanometer. The logistic regression model estimated an odds ratio (OR) of 2.17 (95% confidence interval (CI)=1.65-2.85) for raised blood pressure in men and 1.92 (95% CI=1.35-2.74) in women for every 1 ppm increase in sulfate levels. In a sub-analysis by age, there were no associations in men below 45 years of age. However, associations were only significant in those over 45 years of age. The results observed in this study are consistent with those previously reported, although in this case the pollutants responsible are sulfate and ozone, given that particulate matter is not a factor in this region. We are now more than a month and a half into the new year. We can
